MARCH

PACIFIC RHYTHM - PG.8

With a physical location now open in Chinatown, Pacific Rhythm is the latest Vancouver record shop catering to the city's ever-growing dance crowd. Browse through tough-to-find house and techno-oriented wax and cassettes or pick up some party supplies from their in-store neighbours Snack City. It's a win-win-win situation.

SUR UNE PLAGÉ - PG.20

Legerdemain, Sur Une Plage's new release, tells stories through electronic dance beats and thoughtful lyrics. Check out what members Joshua Wells and Colin McKill have to say about entering the world of electronica for the first time, releasing Legerdemain through their own record label, and "The Balloon Factory."

ART SIGNIFIED - PG.24

Part promotions company, part artist management, part art creative collective, the folks at Art Signified are doing it all — and doing it well. Read on to learn about how the Art Signified tag-team got started and where they are headed next.

JORDAN KOOP - PG.42

Recently relocated recording engineer Jordan Koop heads from the Noise Floor to Southern France for a week of intense analogue education from one of rock'n'roll's angriest frontmen: Steve Albini.

SILVER FOX POSTERING - PG.56

What's the story behind the countless pieces of art and advertisement plastered all around our city? The fine folks at Silver Fox Postering shed light on the industry and the effort it takes to become a successful independent poster service.

LITTLE RED SOUNDS - PG.61

Running the show at Vancouver's most exciting recording studio, Little Red Sounds, Felix Fung sat down with Discorder to discuss his time working with the city's most electrifying acts, as well as his philosophy on music and the creative process from behind the scenes.

EDITOR'S NOTE

TWO INTRODUCTIONS AND A FAREWELL

Illustration by Alison Sadler

Alright folks, we've got a lot to talk about and an ever-depleting word count to do it in, so let's get right into it.

This March 2015 issue is a special one for a couple of reasons. It marks a satisfying personal payoff for me because it's a near exhaustive realization of a goal set back in the summer. At a strategic planning meeting, Discorder's finest came together to talk about what we'd like to see in the next year from the magazine. We agreed that one of the things we do really well is highlight content that's hyper-local and generally emerging, but something I've had the personal desire for is pursuing stories beyond our bread-and-butter band profiles. I wanted to showcase other areas of the Vancouver music scene and a result of this is our latest issue.

We're taking a look at areas that don't always get the same attention as the musicians performing on stage in front of you, like our cover feature on Silver Fox Postering, a local postering company with an amazing outlook on building community, or our profile on prominent recording studio Little Red Sounds and the man at the helm of it, Felix Fung. We also caught up with Noise Floor Recording's Jordan Koop and talked about his recent experience as an understudy for Steve Albini in France, as well as a piece on Pacific Rhythm's new brick and mortar location, some of our regular columns, and, just because having no band features would be ridiculous, we have a piece on electronic ambient duo Sur Une Plage. It's a fairly unique issue and I'm immensely proud of everyone who worked so hard to make it a reality.

Now that you're familiar with what to expect in the pages to come, I guess we should address my note's titular "farewell": mine, to all of you. March 2015 will be my last issue as editor-in-chief of Discorder.

It's not like this editor's note is my literary equivalent to dropping the mic. I'll be staying on through next month in a supporting role but as far as having a direct, open channel to our readers, this is it.

After suffering stage-three writer's block for the last several weeks, I found myself pursuing the Discorder archives and gandering at previous editors' farewell notes, hoping for some inspiration or maybe a hint of what direction I should take my goodbye in. The general consensus of exiting editors seems to be the same every time: their experiences at Discorder were incredible (like mine have been), they enjoyed getting to know the rad staff and students at at CiTR and Discorder (sometimes they're too rad), they couldn't have been prouder of getting to watch countless writers, photographers, and illustrators develop (I know I couldn't be), and no matter how amazing all of these things were, it was time for them to move onto other things. Paraphrasing aside, I couldn't have put it better myself.

Twenty months—or just over one-and-a-half years—may not seem like a lot, but it's hard to quantify this kind of a job with increments of time. The reality is this was the kind of job that permeated every aspect of my life, ranging from being introduced at shows as the editor and getting to hear some of my favourite albums before their release date, to getting texts from writers at 3 a.m. and checking my emails nine times a day. It's an encompassing, fast-paced, fun world to be a part of, but with my time in post-secondary nearing its twilight, it's time for me to leave this rollicking position for someone new to enjoy it.

In the meantime, until your new EIC takes over at the start of April, I feel great knowing that the magazine is in good hands: for the next month, our two section editors Alex de Boer and Robert Catherall will be co-helming the April issue as co-editors. In my time at Discorder, I've known both Catherall and de Boer as talented writers, supportive editors, and dear friends, and it's fitting for me to see these brilliant, capable individuals join editorial forces in my absence. Working alongside them has made a dream job somehow even better and I'll miss it probably more than I should.

In whatever capacity we may have known each other in—whether as a contributor, a reader, a friend, an online heckler, a co-worker, a collaborator, or even just someone I got to talk to at a show—thanks for having me. I'll let my friend Vonnegut lead me out via signoff, one last time.

So it goes,
Jacey Gibb

CITR's charts reflect what's been played on the air by CITR's lovely DJs last month. Records with asterisks (*) are Canadian and those marked (+) are local. Most of these excellent albums can be found at fine independent music stores across Vancouver. If you can't find them, give CITR's music coordinator a shout at (604) 822-8733. Her name is Sarah Cordingley. If you ask nicely she'll tell you how to find them. Check out other great campus/community radio charts at www.earshot-online.com.

PACIFIC RHYTHM TOUCHES GROUND IN CHINATOWN

by Daniel Lins // Photography by Jaqueline Manoukian // Illustrations by Dana Kearley

As with the now-extinct Blockbuster or endangered bookstore, you're far more likely to see a record shop boarding up its windows than opening its doors these days — which makes it all the more exciting when a new one crops up.

Enter Pacific Rhythm in Chinatown, the freshest spot in Vancouver to pick up dance-oriented music in physical formats. The store was born in 2013 as an online hub for anyone looking to avoid the prohibitive shipping costs of ordering records from Europe, as well as a North American outlet for Vancouver-based labels. An expanding customer base led to a highly anticipated brick-and-mortar location, which had its opening party on February 8 and featuring an afternoon of music from some of the city's most respected DJs.

Based out of Snack City, a boutique convenience store just off the corner of Hastings and Gore, Pacific Rhythm is a pleasantly informal affair. Moving past coin-operated candy machines and shelves chock-full of everything from kettle corn and bulk quinoa to Band-Aids and cat food, the vinyl stacks are cozily located in the back, across from a table covered by neatly arranged cassette tapes. Overlooking the collection from a Mac-adorned desk, like a benevolent mafia boss of house music and good vibes, is store founder Derek Duncan. When he isn't shipping orders across the continent and around the world, Duncan is also known as the remarkably busy DJ D.Deer, spinning records into early morning hours on a near-weekly basis. Equally important to the functioning of Pacific Rhythm are Dane Brown and Russell Cunningham, who along with Duncan run the organization's logistical side.

The store boasts a sophisticated selection of dance records, rarities and must-haves, and some classics but mostly new stuff. The labels represented include Beats in Space, L.I.E.S., Future Times and Peoples Potential Unlimited, among other smaller imprints that are difficult, if not impossible to find in most Vancouver record shops. When I spoke with Derek in mid-February, Pacific Rhythm's bins were filled mostly with backstock from the online store, but with a slew of new arrivals on the way, he expected the number of titles to double in coming weeks. There's also a rapidly growing used records section with affordable and tastefully curated choices.

Though Pacific Rhythm caters to, and is frequented by a particular niche of house and techno DJs, its collection is an accessible and valuable resource for anyone with an interest in the rich world of electronic music that strays from the mainstream. It's also shaping up to be the local go-to for finding exclusive pressings at reasonable prices — as an example, I picked up White Visitation's shop-only 2014 release on L.I.E.S. for under $20 at Pacific Rhythm, a record that currently sells on Discogs.com for prices as high as $50 (plus international shipping).

But like an Autobot, Pacific Rhythm is more than meets the eye, playing a much bigger role in Vancouver than just as a really good local record outlet.

Last year was a big one for the city's dance music scene, though this might come as news to those not thoroughly aware of its bubbling existence. Due in large part to the record label and party collective known as Mood Hut, as well as Vancouver-based cassette purveyors 1080p collection, 2014 saw releases from local artist like Pender Street Steppers, Hashman DeeJay, D. Tiffany, and Lnrdcroy that reverberated powerfully on the web and across the globe. Long overdue, the first Vancouver Boiler Room session streamed live in January of last year and 1080p was among the top imprints on several reputable websites' end-of-year favourites lists. This galvanizing surge of musical output and international attention is solidifying Vancouver's place on the map alongside London, Berlin, and New York.

Pacific Rhythm has been an important nexus in this process. They regularly throw mind-blowing and unique parties showcasing DJs and producers from Vancouver and beyond. These include Good Feelings, a series of dance events that take place on long weekend Sundays, and Pacific Rhythm Sessions, the sixth and most recent of which featured live performances from New York-based dark techno guru Terekke and local synth wizard Friendly Chemist.

On top of that, Pacific Rhythm is also a burgeoning record label. It only has one 12-inch in its catalogue so far, but it's a hell of a release: Rhythms of the Pacific Volume 1 came out late last year to widespread acclaim, with tracks from Lnrdrroy (one of them an extended version of the essential "Sunrise Market"), Memory Man, and Vancouver's reigning authority on hardware and acid house, Cloudface. The record sold out quickly, but was promptly repressed in January, and is available in-store.

2015 is turning out to be a special year for anyone in Vancouver who enjoys getting sweaty on warehouse dancefloors and in studio spaces filled to the brim with human heat. Pacific Rhythm's motto, printed on the back of their official T-shirts, reads "Stay out late, it feels great!" And they've made it their mission to help you do it.

If you're looking to expand your vinyl collection — and pick up some snacks while you're at it — Pacific Rhythm is located at 441 Gore Ave. in Chinatown, and is open Tuesday to Sunday, from 11 a.m. until 7 p.m.

FILM STRIPPED

TOMORROW IS ALWAYS TOO LONG

by Selina Crammond // Illustrations by Kalena McKiewicz

Part musical, part documentary, Tomorrow is Always Too Long is perhaps most effectively described as a multimedia collage. Its defining visual elements include blasts of public access TV-meets-YouTube clips intertwined with silhouette animation reminiscent of Lotte Reiniger's pioneering work.

The film is also the ultimate exercise in collaboration as filmmaker Phil Collins — British video artist, not the guy from Genesis — is joined by an auspicious crew of writers, animators, indie musicians, an orchestra, and everyday Glaswegians who come together to create an endearing, bizarre homage to Glasgow, Scotland.

Are you with me now?

At its core, Tomorrow is Always Too Long is a musical documentary, the most understated, glorious film genre in which ordinary folks sing their story, superseding the more traditional talking head interview. Collins features a wide cross-section of brave ordinary Glaswegians in his film who surrender to song, if only for three minutes, breaking free from the drudgery of daily life.

The chosen subjects span the generations and social enclaves of Glasgow, from punk-rock parents in a birthing class to preppy teens singing in a classroom as a teacher leads them through an unmistakably pre-pubescent dance routine. There's also a young man singing in his jail cell, as well as an elderly couple who wail as they weave themselves around a ballroom dance floor. Each musical sequence is set to Cate Le Bon's 2013 psych-pop album, Mug Museum. What makes these "covers" extra special is that Le Bon's songs have been rearranged and performed by the Royal Scottish National Orchestra, making for larger-than-life musical breakdowns.

Musical sequences aside, the rest of the soundtrack is scored by Mogwai's Barry Burns and Glasgow locals Golden Teacher. The often eerie, electronic soundscape these musicians create accompany shadowy animated sequences from Matthew Robins. His silhouette animation depicts pleasure-seeking creatures, both human and animal, in voyeuristic scenes humping in the forest, snorting lines in a bathroom stall, and drinking alone at a bar. Their eyes are cut-out holes, allowing the background to shine through. There's something about this transparency, combined with the non-stop debauchery that make these creatures vulnerable, disturbed, and the most human of all.

Between the musical numbers, and interlaced with some of the raunchy animated sequences, is an imaginary TV channel. It features an assortment of sardonic vignettes with an aesthetic reminiscent of early '90s public access television. There are fake commercials for made-up products, such as "Search Me," a device that guarantees anyone wearing it will succeed in getting a groping from airport security; a game show in which contestants nonchalantly answer questions about pop culture and terrorism; and most poignant of all, a disgruntled mystic, whose 1-800 info-commercial is centered smack dab in the middle of the film. In the longest single-take of the piece, she laments technology for an increasingly alienated society and longs for a time when people were genuinely connected.

But in Collins’ film, it is clear that “online culture” is not the only thing to blame for isolation: the cityscape and institutions also play a considerable, disruptive role.

Simply describing Collins’ erratic film is hard enough, so trying to make sense of it is another feat altogether. But what I liked most is that despite its frenetic pacing, the structure is cyclical, self-reflective, and almost soothing. While themes of alienation run wild — whether it’s due to technology, institutions, or the city itself — there’s a warm air of nostalgia that breezes through each scene. Collins’ wacky brand of storytelling shows that sometimes it’s easier, and more satisfying, to re-create the past than it is to imagine a future. For if tomorrow is always too long, then yesterday wasn’t long enough.

DISORDER REVISITED

NINETEEN: THE YEAR OF THE GHETTOBLASTER

by Erica Leiren // Illustrations by Kim Pringle

In 1980, I convinced two of my best friends, Colleen and Marianne, we should spend the following school year studying French at Laval University in Quebec City. Once we'd all secured bursaries for living expenses, the plan became a reality.

Together, along with a French-Canadian roommate, we took over a four-bedroom dungeon/basement suite in Quebec. We all got along great and even shared most of our meals together, but one thing we didn't share was our tastes in music.

During that year, Marianne had the only means of playing our cassettes, a small tape player/recorder, which she kindly shared. We practiced our harmonies anytime the tape player was in the kitchen but if Marianne felt like getting romantic with her boyfriend (and future husband), she'd retreat to her own room where they listened to Billy Joel and Chris de Burgh. Bleh.

Despite Marianne's generosity, I was getting no time at home on the communal tape player for my own music. I'd brought along a bunch of cassettes taped off my own vinyl from home: The Pointed Sticks singles, The Subhumans, Young Canadians, Maurice & the Clichés. My roommates were polite but I could tell they hated my weird music; I needed my own machine to listen to my own tapes.

My music situation was still a problem around the time our university announced that they would be organizing a New York trip for students during reading break.

I was the only one of the roommates who signed up for the New York trip, though I'd convinced another friend Patrice that the trip couldn't be missed. And so we set out early one day mid-reading week with a busload of fellow Laval students, bound for a city we'd heard was the place for cut-rate electronics — and my holy grail, a ghetto blaster to play my own music on.

The first evening, before our hotel was ready for us to check in, we unleashed some pent up energy from the long bus ride by hitting the streets in excited groups, sightseeing as we foraged for dinner. Each succeeding crosswalk elicited increasing thrills as we recognized the names and numbers from the songs and movies we'd enjoyed our entire lives. When we came to legendary Broadway, corny though it may seem, we actually burst into the song spontaneously and skipped and danced down the street from the sheer joy and excitement of being there and being 19 and being with our friends.

I rode the subway for the first time, which was a thrill in itself. I don't remember where we went, but what sticks in my mind from the ride is how extravagantly the subways at that time were decorated — and I don't mean officially. It was the graffiti. Graffiti was something we didn't have in Vancouver then, but we'd heard about it and here it was for real. Menacing, multi-coloured, jagged and angular, the graffiti smothered every single surface, including the ads all along the top of each car and every available in-between space.

It was most striking not for what it said — I don't recall any of the slogans or the names — but for the intent with which it was executed. The graffiti quite clearly expressed sheer wild violence and willful unbounded nihilism of a sort that I had never seen before (or since). In fact, the next time I was in New York, six years later, I was astonished to find that there was no graffiti whatsoever anymore on the subway. The city had been wiped clean by its crusading mayor and it was as though the graffiti had never been there. I was traveling with my boyfriend that time, and it was hard to convey to someone who didn't know just what it was like. The feeling of threat evoked was omnipresent on the subway as you rode. We all just sat tight and took it in. This most definitely, Dorothy, was not Kansas anymore.

At the same time as our visit, David Bowie was playing at The Booth Theatre on Broadway in The Elephant Man. We loved Bowie and seeing a Broadway play in New York was mandatory, so this was perfect. We learned that you could buy same-day tickets cheaply if you showed up at the box office and opted for a matinee, which was the cheapest; the plan worked and during one of our New York days, we got tickets. Being that close to Bowie was mind-blowing. It was early on in the run — he played at The Booth Theatre from late September 1980 to early January 1981 — and by the time we saw the play, he'd perfectly settled in but the performance was still fresh.

The last day was D-Day for purchasing my ghettoblaster. Our group tramped to Times Square together, then at its most squalid, ringed by peep shows and not much that reminded us of Dick Clark's New Year's Eve countdown. However, we had no other basis for comparison, and were unconcerned by the parade of working girls and boys. I remember way-cool looking guys with huge ghettoblasters heaved up on their shoulders and blasting some unfamiliar type of talking-music, mostly rhythm to our unschooled ears. We'd never seen ghettoblasters in action before.

Cutting to the chase, a few of us scoped the electronics stores in the vicinity. Like they all were, the store where I found my baby was brightly lit and sparkled enticingly from within like some electronics Aladdin's Cave. Inside, all lined up and stacked on the full back wall behind the counter, was the treasure, an array of ghettoblasters shining in all their silvery glory. I was in a bit of a hurry because the bus was leaving soon, I decisively forked over the $150 for my beautiful Sharp GF-5656 AM/FM Radio cassette tape recorder. It's sitting on the chair beside me, even as I write this.

Looking like some modern take on a short-wave radio, it sports a beautiful, long extendable aerial, with the biggest part of its front taken up by the speaker grill. The buttons are numerous, and give a fully satisfying sensation when punched.

That day, I carried it proudly to the bus and, with that, our mission was accomplished.

For the rest of our Laval University year, that ghettoblaster took over the prime broadcasting location on our kitchen table. I listened to Vancouver saxophonist Fraser McPherson's wonderful cassette Live at the Planetarium whenever I did my homework and saved my faster tunes for non-school related activities. It also played centre stage in early December at our big Christmas party that year, before exams hit — and during the soiree, I made sure to give everyone's music fair play.

SUR UNE PLAGE

SLEIGHT OF HAND

by Esmée Colbourne // Photography by Tara Bigdeli

"You better go get some shoes."

Under normal circumstances, an afternoon at the Grandview Bowling lanes would seem commonplace; but on a pleasant Sunday with ambient electronic duo Sur Une Plage, it's the perfect setting for an interview.

Surrounded by pizza parties, young children, and men drinking beer, Sur Une Plage's laidback atmosphere and impressive bowling form instantly break the ice. The lane's vintage pins and homey atmosphere disintegrate any distance between interviewer and subjects — so much that I decide to save my questions for after the game, opting to focus on trying to bowl straight and not lose too hard.

Feeling a bit out of my league, I watch with Joshua Wells as his bandmate Colin McKill bowls a strike on his first try. Thought it ultimately proves to be a feat of luck rather than skill, the strike is still intimidating.

"I just want to make sure that it's noted how clutch that was," says McKill, "because that was pretty clutch. I was like, 'Oh man, maybe bowling is super easy' and then I got, like, one other strike the entire time ... [That's] the first time I've played in two years."

While bowling may not be a full-time passion for the two men, they do share the pastime of music together. Both are involved or have been involved with a myriad of recognizable Vancouver bands, including Black Mountain and Hard Drugs, but our focus for the interview is on a newer collaborative project: Sur Une Plage.

The pair's debut album, Legerdemain — which translates to "sleight of hand" — is a gratifying listen filled with cosmic synths, a heavy-beating bass heartbeat, and forlorn lyrics centred around tragedy. The album itself was influenced by a manifestation of music heard during childhood and the beats of hip-hop; while McKill likes the precision and beats of electronic music, and tries to "inject some sort of feeling" into robotic walls of sound, Wells is "really into the primal years of synthesized music and particularly when that collided with pop music."

The album was recorded and produced at The Balloon Factory, a studio Wells shares with his partner in the band Lightning Dust, Amber Webber. The origin story of the studio and jam space is something of a mystery: it's called The Balloon Factory because their landlord claims that's what it was before they moved in, though neither are convinced he's telling the truth.

"No one believes him for a second that there was actually a balloon factory in a sketchy basement in East Vancouver," says Wells, still in denial.

Aside from recording and producing Legerdemain in their own space, Sur Une Plage are enjoying the kinds of freedom that come with releasing an album independently — or rather through their own record label, Party Product.

Wells and McKill opted to release on their own label so they could have a quicker release time by not having to pitch and then become part of a release schedule. Wells has always wanted to see a record through start to finish, having experienced producing punk cassettes and seven-inches, appreciating the creative process, and having worked on LPs with other bands.

Another benefit to having their own record label is that McKill and Wells were able to control all of the marketing for their new LP.

Hard to witness and yet easy to absorb, Sur Une Plage's goal with their YouTube channel is to above all make people laugh while announcing tours and releases. Marketing isn't their first priority, so they decided to have fun with filming. Purposely awkward, with terrifying jump cuts, colour inversion, and the inclusion of Chauncey, a white 1988 Cadillac, their videos are definitely worth checking out.

In terms of other band promotion, the duo has also created a perfect link between the record's sound and its artwork. McKill explains: "The literal interpretation is it's the interior light from this 1988 white Cadillac that I stumbled across." The extreme close-up of the light creates sharp texture, not unlike some of the harder synth sounds in their music. It also shows square symmetry to the vortex of an otherwise black cover. A mutual love of vinyl, they believe that the physical act of putting a needle on a record establishes a secondary intimacy with the music, making listeners establish a relationship with the sound. As Wells puts it, "This record feels as good as it sounds."

Experimenting with wintery electronic sound and leaving behind the traditional band format, Sur Une Plage have complete control over what they do, aiming to enjoy themselves through learning and creation.

Sur Une Plage's album Legerdemain drops March 17, available through local Vancouver record stores, online, or through their Bandcamp.

ART SIGNIFIED

VANCOUVER'S PARTY PROFESSIONALS AND THEIR PUNK ROCK WORK ETHIC

by Christopher Lennox-Aasen // Photography by Severn Bowen // Illustrations by Sharon Ko

Art Signified hit the ground running two years ago. As I walk from The Bottle Shop liquor store to Suna Studios with Mitch Ray and Taya Fraser, they tell me about the whole thing got started.

“Even before Art Signified, I was forcing myself to book a show a month,” explains Ray. “I set a rule and I wasn’t willing to break it. It was a good way to get into the grind of it and develop my work ethic.” He punches in the code for a security door and we walk inside.

“I used to work at Iron Road (a jam space which doubled as an after-hours venue) and I wanted to bring that vibe back to life,” says Fraser as we settle into some well-worn couches. “I never wanted to promote, but it just sort of happened. We kept referring bands to one another, and it hit us. Now we’re busy all the time. Last year we did roughly eight shows a month.”

The raging success that was their anniversary party back in January can attest to how integral to the scene they’ve become. The show consisted of nearly 30 bands on two stages over two nights. The duo have become known for putting on exactly this sort of creative and exciting concerts, such as their 10-band bills and their upcoming “day drunk” shows. They always have a few other ideas up their sleeves, but you’ll just have to wait to hear about them — we wouldn’t want to spoil the surprise.

“I think we’re lucky because we’ve gotten to the point where we have creative licence to do all the weird shit we want, because we’ve been so successful,” says Ray, grinning broadly. “Or maybe we’re just lucky.”

“We just try to make sure it’s a show that we’d want to go see,” adds Fraser. “We like to party and have a good time as well, and we want everyone to have the very best time they can.”

Ray explains: “We want bands to be able to show up and not worry about anything. We deal with all the details. We want the crowd to have the shows they remember for years, you know? The thing is, we have a huge game plan. We know what we want to do, and that’s already a full plate. There is also an abundance of stuff thrown at us, and that can double or triple the workload.”

For instance, Art Signified has dived into the world of band management.

“Eric Campbell & The Dirt came to us and asked us out of the blue to manage them,” says Ray. “It was a curveball, but they’re talented, and we love them, so it worked out. BRASS was the natural second addition. As of right now we don’t want to bring on more ... but we’re learning, maybe down the ways.”

“I like working with bands that are goal-oriented, you know? We never work with bands we don’t think are awesome,” says Fraser. “We want to move into booking tours also.”

What Art Signified, and all promoters, do is largely thankless, behind-the-scenes grunt work. However, Ray and Fraser have reached the point where people come out to their shows because they know an Art Signified show is going to be good. It’s a great way for people to discover new music, and the contributions they’ve made to strengthening the scene are tremendous. I tell them so and they laugh, not maliciously; they just don’t know what to say.

"WE WANT BANDS TO BE ABLE TO SHOW UP AND NOT WORRY ABOUT ANYTHING. WE DEAL WITH ALL THE DETAILS. WE WANT THE CROWD TO HAVE THE SHOWS THEY REMEMBER FOR YEARS."

Ray cracks a fresh beer as he muses: "The thing is, we do the little things, and when you do the little things, you always think no one notices. But the right people do, and when they do it really makes me feel that much more optimistic in general."

For a promoting company to have as good of a track record and reputation as Art Signified does is really difficult; booking punk-rock shows can be a topsy-turvy business. I ask what their closest near-miss has been and Fraser and Ray stare at each other for a moment. Fraser motions for Ray to tell the tale:

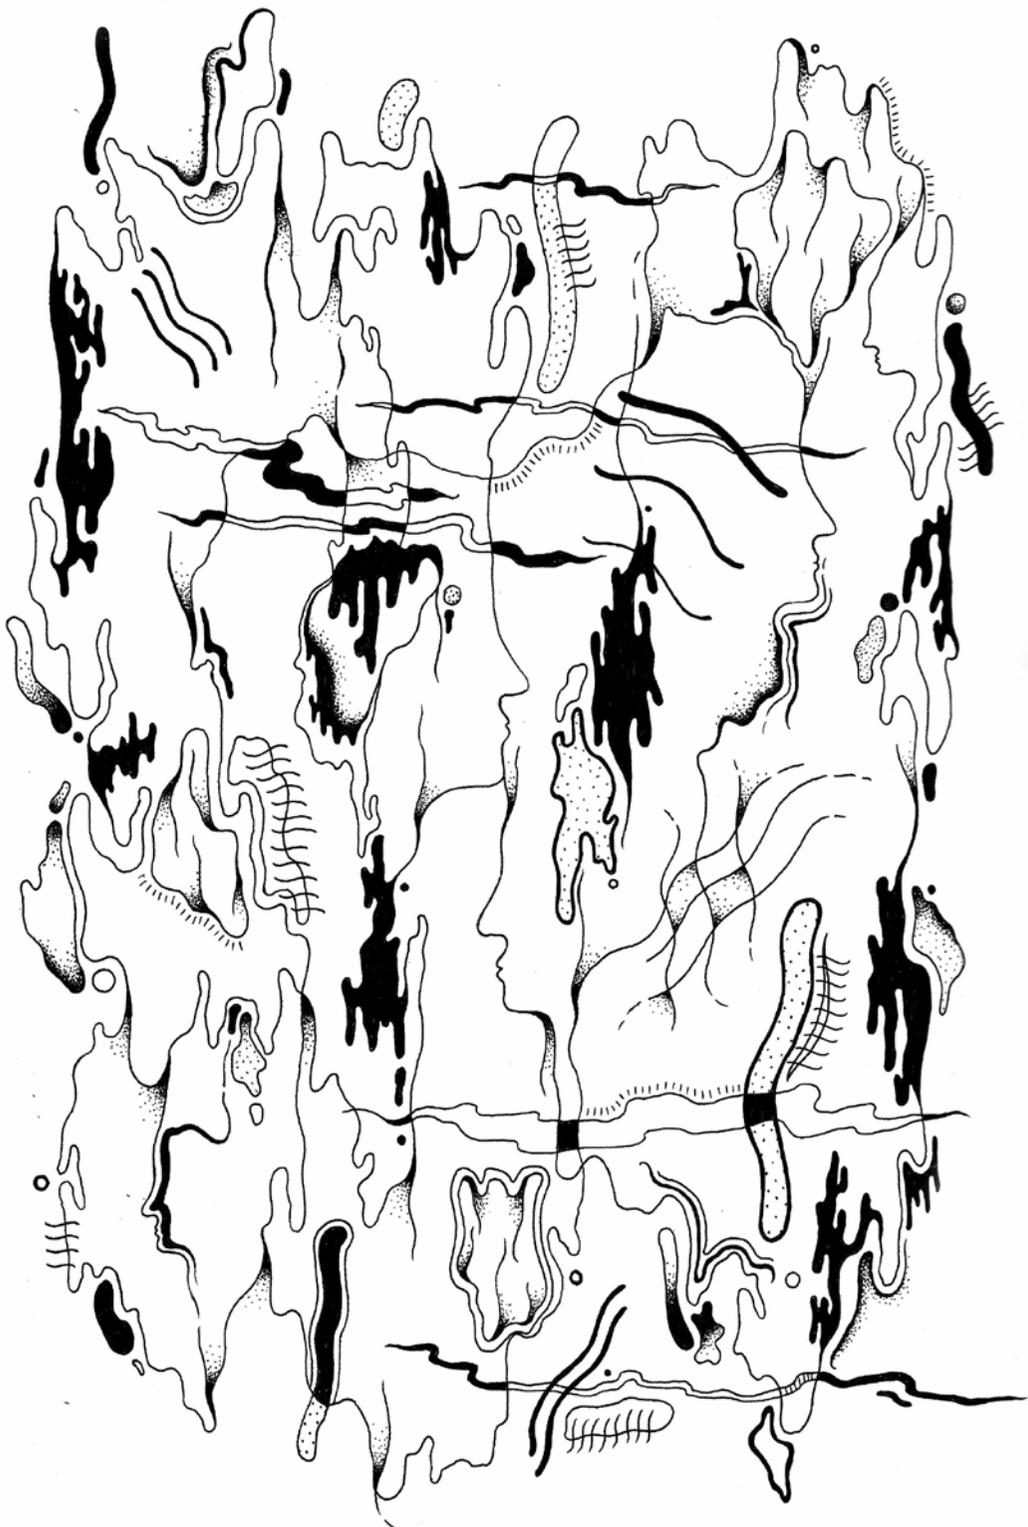

"In February of last year, we did a show with Radio Moscow, which to this day might be one of the biggest bands we've worked with. We put everything into that show. It was at [a venue that didn't have a licence]. We had to send slightly illegal border paperwork to a big band with a big booking agency. Because the show was only semi-legal, we couldn't publicly promote the show as much as I'd like. It had to be an 'ask around' sort of thing. We couldn't reveal the name of the venue on posters and whatnot. With a big band with a high guarantee, that's not an ideal situation at all."

"We also had another show going on that night already," adds Fraser, "but it was just such a big opportunity and we couldn't turn it down."

"I was texting the band, and around 8 p.m. they go quiet," says Ray between sips of beer. "After an hour, they let me know they were going through an awful search. I was thinking, 'Fuck, my money is all gone. I fucked up with one of my favourite bands and a big booking agency.' It was fucked. But they made it! They showed up halfway through Black Wizard's set and it was absolutely incredible. That really was the closest we've come to an absolute disaster."

"Instead, we made the guarantee and were still able to pay the locals. It was a fucking homerun."

REAL LIVE ACTION.

FEBRUARY

WEED / SO PITTED FEBRUARY 5 / ZULU RECORDS

To kick off their tour for the forthcoming Running Back LP, Weed lit up Zulu Records on February 5 with their signature muddy punk sound. Teenagers to fans in their 50s crammed the aisles of Zulu Records wearing everything from spiked bracelets and black lipstick to American Apparel hoodies and Louboutins.

Opening was Seattle band So Pitted, who snatched the attention of scattered music junkies scouring for records with their ear-splitting sound check. Their set delivered raw, metal-laden punk full of attitude. Supersonic beats and piercing sounds altered the mood from song to song as the discordant feedback kept the feeling alive. They wrapped up the set with extremely harsh reverberation and singer/guitarist/drummer Nathan Rodriguez yelling, "I'm so fucking full of hate!"

Weed then took the stage and their name-sake's smell filled the room as well. When I first saw them, what struck me was how different all of them were; the way they moved and dressed. But as they began to play their music, I saw the interconnection between them for the passion of the music they were producing. And the all ages, immensely dissimilar crowd seemed to find a common ground as they moved to the thick grunge noise that had no fixed rhythm.

The instrumentals were so overpowering that they buried Will Anderson's vocals, probably intentionally. The feedback between sets muffled the crowd's applause and cheers. Hugo Noriega moved with the music, twisting with every strum of his bass. The contagious energy from the music fueled the crowd as they began to bounce their heads while guitarist Kevin Doherty swayed in the background, usually not facing the crowd. In the back, drummer Bobby Siadat gave an energetic and adrenalized performance. The band concluded their show after a short set of seven songs, leaving the audience in awe.

During the set, I continuously asked myself what exactly it was about this disjointed wall of noise that made it enjoyable. A couple times I even questioned if it was all a dream. Was it the blasting loud punching beat? The long screech of the guitar between songs? The scarcely heard vocals? The few guys in my peripheral vision head banging to every beat?

I honestly couldn't tell you. What I can tell you is that — through all the sloppiness and craziness — Weed's set worked.

They're not your conventional new wave Vancouver band. Their harsh sounds could scare or discomfort some people and definitely is not for everyone. But under all of the feedback and noise was something different, and throughout the gritty and intense performance the raw aspect of their music shone through, captivating everybody in the room with their individuality.—Nathan Sing

WEEKEND BENDER FEBRUARY 5-8 / THE ASTORIA

Well thought-out and timely scheduling drove the Astoria Weekend Bender, as it brought together a complete muddle of genres over the course of four days. Many events are dubbed a "festival" these days, but the events that truly give off that energy practice more unison in the types of acts and the recurring guests to each act. The event featured one touring group, Automelodi, making the Saturday evening a more expensive cover charge for the Astoria at $12. The rest of the shows were just another weekend event in the Vancouver music scene.

Thursday night commenced with power-pop outfit Sightlines. The vocals were good with a clear infusion of '90s poppy adult alternative, but at points a competition for volume with the simple power punk instrumentals. They didn't really interact with the audience, which gave off an awkward yet endearing vibe. The succeeding band, Weird Candle, continued the punk theme with Kileroy Katerwol's gritty performance and vocals. "Come closer so I'm not by myself," said Katerwol as he paced all over the stage. The tempo of the industrial beats never wavered between songs as Katerwol maintained his energy for the half hour set. The evening took an upswing with an ever-entertaining show from The Pretty's. To end the night, Black Magique took the vibe down to a dark, slow, ambience that encouraged dancing with ominous vocals that unfortunately at times sounded flat.

Metal night filled the Astoria despite numerous other heavy acts ongoing in Vancouver on the Friday evening. As a History major, I was stoked on Pyramidion's ancient Egypt-themed metal. Kyle Scott stuck to the narrative for about half the time before he reverted back to a normal set. The two handed tapping technique on the guitar was a miss for Pyramidion and made their sound a bit too busy.

Ogroem's very fast grind riffs were elevated with the lack of bass. They had a theatrical performance with onesies and samples from an iPod to introduce songs. Neck of the Woods took the peak hour of the night with a well-executed entrance as Jeff Radomsky rowdily took the floor after a minute of instrumental intro. Their songs were well structured and every member had a great set of riffs that kept the set engaging. I enjoy seeing a metal vocalist that performs well, even for a stagnant audience, and Radomsky put a positive spin on his solo moshing by exclaiming, "Every time I touch you, I get excited."

Skull Vultures started at 1 a.m. for a thinned out crowd. The dark sounding vocals worked well with the prog-influenced guitar. Jason Puder sounded like a complete monster, and his weird microphone height made him look like a headbanging dinosaur. Their sound came through the Astoria's system clearly, with tons of unique structure to their songs that experimented with various sub-genres.

Watermelon was on stage when I arrived on Saturday night, and I had difficulty hearing any clarity from their surf-y riffs. They all looked incredibly bored with their set, which translated to the audience. Having seen many shows at the Astoria, I know that the PA isn't the ideal setup for a lot of electronic artists, but when vocals are a dominant element of the music, some time spent setting the balance and volume correct would have done wonders for the synth and vocals acts. I know how the system can sound, and it really dictated how much I enjoyed the bands on Saturday.

A solo act from Seattle, Charlatan performed as people trickled in — undoubtedly to catch Montreal based Automelodi. Charlatan's use of noise-based guitar effects struck a strange balance between difficult to decipher vocals and looping electronic bass tones. He did throw a lot of sound for one person, and the combination of musical elements echoed throughout the room. The touring act, Automelodi, graced the stage quickly. His take on electronic was refreshing for a tired reviewer with an impending head-cold. His vocals were soft but audible and clear. The set up was percussion and keyboard based, giving it a sound that vaguely reminded me of Purity Ring.

After the third night, I took an educated guess that I might have been the only person to try and conquer all four nights. I was unsuccessful and succumbed to a nasty head-cold on Sunday morning, causing Sunday night to not be reviewed. It was an admirable feat, coordinating four nights of shows in a row. However, this event will not be on my radar for next year. —Erin Jardine

FREAK HEAT WAVES / DADA PLAN /
WOOLWORM / WET FACE / FEBRUARY 7 /
THE FOX CABARET

On the night of Friday, February 7, Victoria's Freak Heat Waves pulled together a solid lineup for a night at the Fox Cabaret to highlight the release of their latest album, Bonnie's State of Mind.

Having never been to the porno-theatre-turned-concert-hall or seen any of the bands before, I wasn't sure what to expect besides red lights and some vaguely rock-y sounds. The lights ended up being very red, but the sounds were far from vague.

To open, we were treated to a few songs interspersed with some witty commentary by Wetface, who played from behind a piano he painted himself. There was some heckling — Wetface will take your requests but will not play the same song twice — and someone tripping over an amp to bring a glass of water on stage. Apparently, for all its amenities, the Fox still doesn't offer an on-stage water fountain. It wasn't a long set, but by the end the floor was packed and the previously quiet cabaret was now bumping.

After a break just long enough to get the next beer, Woolworm came on stage and treated the crowd to some heavy guitar sounds, bridging the gap from Wet Face to Dada Plan pretty nicely.

Next up was Dada Plan, who brought out the biggest lineup of the night, including keyboard and congas. The latter are a rare sight in Vancouver, and as soon as they were set up I had the feeling we were in for something special. The set was good, and anyone who was previously unfamiliar is sure to remember the steady tono seco coming from the drums.

Finally, the time came for the main event: Freak Heat Waves. The trio made the stage seem very large, but the first song made it obvious that their sound could fill the Fox with energy to spare. In good krautrock form, they laid down a set with throbbing, steady bass and vocals expertly treading the line between robotics and emotion, all anchored by the drummer's excellent technique. Although their stage presence was slightly subdued, the same can't be said of their energy, which obviously found its way from the stage into the crowd. In the end, even with the last bus home rapidly drawing up, the magnetism of that sound would have drawn me back to the stage for another set.—Patrick Gillin

ARIEL PINK / JACK NAME
FEBRUARY 11 / RICKSHAW THEATRE

On February 11 at The Rickshaw, Ariel Pink's first words to his eager crowd were, "Where's the smoke?" Whether his goal was to obscure our view or heighten the aesthetic, it was clear that the man had an eye for detail.

Before Ariel Pink's whisper of an entrance, opening act Jack Name and his two bandmates formed a triangle and faced inward with their instruments. Occasional vocals droned out of the triangle's peak. Name contributed to Ariel Pink's 2014 release, Pom Pom, which explained his presence, but the act seemed a bit out of place.

Then, donning glitter and animal print loungewear, aviation goggles atop his head, Ariel Pink launched into songs from his new album.

I first saw Ariel Pink's Haunted Graffiti at Malkin Bowl in 2010, opening for the Flaming Lips. Pink's 2014 release undoubtedly showcases this influence — the first half of the set was infused with bizarre fun, spilling magic and dopamine onto the people below.

Ariel Pink's fascination with post-production, evident in the album itself, carried over to the live performance. His vocals were a distortion of a distortion, amplifying the effect in the studio recording. The performance seemed to be less about hitting the right note and more about expanding the live medium.

Three songs in, Pink paid tribute to the late Kim Fowley before blasting into “Plastic Raincoats in the Pig Parade.” Co-written by Fowley, the upbeat track was a productive celebration of his impact on the band.

“Put Your Number in My Phone” was a love ballad of the modern day — slimy in its subject and cynical in its delivery. Pink performed the answering machine message found on the track, which reveals that although a woman did put her number in his phone, he completely blew her off. Pink’s high-pitched imitation of this woman trying to make contact was stomach-churning but accurate.

The spirit of the show was clearly divided near its midpoint. The up-tempo tracks of Pom Pom bled into its slower songs and other older material. Pink’s vocals switched from that of a cheery cult leader to a Morrissey-like murmur. He clutched a beer and conducted swaying fans with a drumstick.

The band’s energy stayed low for most of the second half, before picking up and closing the main set with the gorgeous “Dayzed Inn Daydreams.”

Drummer Don Bolles reintroduced Pink as the “Jester from Hades” before declaring that there would be no new songs in the encore. It was time for fans devoted to the band’s older sound to receive their just reward. The crowd became enraptured by the big hits, and the show closed on a satisfying note.

The audience did not disperse, but milled about in front of the venue for at least 20 minutes. The band expressed that they had paid a lot to get into this country, but fortunately the deal included unlimited fans willing to give them a tour.—Hannah Thomson

THE MORNING AFTER SHOW

By Meredyth Cole // Photography by Addison Amitt //

This interview has been edited and condensed for print

For a decade and a half now, The Morning After Show has been bringing you a breadth of musical flavours courtesy of the airwaves at CiTR. Discorder recently sat down with host Oswaldo Perez — who’s been with the show for 13 of those 15 years — to learn about how things have changed since he took over the show and about their upcoming anniversary party at the Rickshaw Theatre on March 24.

WHAT DO YOU THINK HAS CHANGED IN THE 13 YEARS YOU’VE BEEN WITH THE SHOW?

The staff of CiTR has changed about three times since I’ve been there. I’ve seen a lot of shows come and go, shows that were before my show and after my show. The Morning After Show was originally at night and it started as more of a punk-rock show. It’s more eclectic now. I still play some punk but I play mostly ska, reggae, and a lot of local indie Vancouver bands. Also the technology has changed; we have new programs in the studio, so it’s easier to find music and other things.

AS SOMEONE WHO WRITES, WHAT DO YOU LIKE ABOUT DOING RADIO AS OPPOSED TO MORE TRADITIONAL, WRITTEN JOURNALISM?

Radio is on the spot, right there. If you make a mistake, there’s no way of fixing the mistake. On the other side, the mistake gets forgotten really fast because you just continue with the show. With writing, you have a lot of time to go through an article or do more research and once it’s published, it’s there. There’s no going back. Radio allows me a lot of spontaneity. I don’t really prepare my shows anymore, I have a vague idea of what I’m going to play. So a lot of improvisation too, I could be playing a song and go, “Oh, I have a song that’s going to go well with this” and then I just improvise and go with that.

At the beginning, I used to even have the times of the songs and everything. I used to have everything planned and now I just kind of know. It gets that way with experience; you learn to manage the time better. I also think radio is more fun than writing.

DO YOU HAVE ANY ADVICE FOR STUDENTS WHO WANT TO START THEIR OWN RADIO SHOW?

It's easier than people think to go on the radio. At CiTR, you just need to take the training and then practice. My advice would be a lot of practice, get familiar with the equipment. We have a studio where you can practice without going on the air, but you can record.

YOU'VE SAID THAT YOU FEEL THERE'S A LACK OF SUPPORT FOR THE ARTS IN VANCOUVER. ARE THERE ANY PLACES IN THE CITY THAT YOU FEEL TRY TO COUNTERACT THAT?

Yeah, there's the Pacific Cinematheque and Vancity Theatre. Those are good examples, they promote a lot in the film industry. The station, CiTR. There are a few good venues that like to support emerging bands — not necessarily well-established bands — like the Hindenburg. It's a new place supporting the local scene.

DO YOU HAVE ANY MEMORABLE MOMENTS FROM THE MORNING AFTER SHOW?

Yeah, I think one of them is when I interviewed Jon Anderson from Yes. That was a cool interview 'cause he was joking around and he speaks with the same voice as when he sings, very high-pitched. I interviewed a couple of my musical idols when I was younger, like the guys from Dead Can Dance and the Cocteau Twins. Those were pretty cool interviews, for sure.

Join The Morning After Show for their 15-year anniversary party on March 24 at the Rickshaw Theatre, where they'll be celebrating alongside Jarabe de Palo, Los Furiros, and Caracas. Advance tickets are available at Horses Records, Zulu, Highlife Records, The Laughing Bean Coffee Co., Red Cat, and Neptoon Records.

I stood at the back wall trying to drink enough beer that I could enjoy standing alone in the crowded room. I was getting used to this.

Hey!

... We met over at Dev's Place. I'm Elise!

I didn't recognize her at first.

You are an artist right?

Well... uh I just draw Comics. I'm Sean.

... Well I like comics.

What are you working on now? I would love to see...

She seemed warm and genuine.

... Well I actually have some with me.

Elise was about to leave so we left the Zoo Zhop together.

We read my Comics on Hastings Street.

It was a convenient escape.

Me and Elise became very good friends after that. Good Night.

JORDAN KOOP

DON'T TOUCH THAT DIAL... UNLESS STEVE ALBINI SAYS SO

by Robert Catherall // Illustrations by R. Castanedo

“Steve really made us feel like peers when we were in the studio. He had his hero/mentor when he was starting out and fully understood what it meant to us,” Jordan Koop explains to me during an online chat. Alluding to Steve Albini’s lifelong relationship with influential English recording engineer John Loder of Southern Records, Koop is now able to draw a parallel to his own relationship with Albini.

Steve Albini is a household name to most within the North American indie music circuit. Whether for his work as frontman of hard-hitting Chicago outfits Big Black and Shellac, or behind the glass on seminal Gen X works like Nirvana’s In Utero or The Pixies’ Surfer Rosa, Albini can count over a thousand songwriting, performance, and engineering credits to his name. Although, with a storied reputation that includes his devotion to analogue techniques and staunch recording ethos, it’s likely his work as a recording engineer where most will remember him from.

Local recording engineer Jordan Koop — who, by all rights, should also be a household name to anyone who’s been around the Vancouver music community in the past 15 years — might remember him a little differently though.

“Steve was smaller than I expected. That was my first impression.”

Still fresh in his mind from a week-long mentorship with Albini, Koop and 14 other participants got a rare chance to learn under the infamous Chicago engineer in a program called “Mix with the Masters.” The program arranges seminars between budding producers and recording engineers at La Fabrique Studios in Southern France, where they learn recording techniques while developing personal relationships with seasoned industry veterans.

Having worked with countless local musicians — from the likes of Shearing Pinx and You Say Party! to assisting iconic local synth-punk outfit Radio Berlin with the recordings of their 2003 masterpiece, Glass — the British Columbian recording engineer was ecstatic to find he had been accepted to learn under the guidance of Steve Albini.

“MY INTENTION WAS TO GET OUT [OF] VANCOUVER, TRY TO BUY A HOUSE, TRY TO LIVE ON A GULF ISLAND, AND ALSO INCORPORATE THE STUDIO. IT HAD A LOT TO DO WITH MY OWN LIFESTYLE, AND THE FACT THAT MY CLIENTS ARE WILLING TO TREK OUT HERE WAS THE ICING ON THE CAKE.”

“[I] was lucky enough to be accepted as one of a dozen or so people from around the world,” types Koop. “He’s someone whom [sic] I respect a lot as an engineer/musician/business owner.”

Totalling more than 100 engineering, mixing, and mastering credits to his name, Koop’s own resumé counts Mushroom Studios, FaderMaster, The Hive, and the Emergency Room (Strathcona) among his residences. Now, he finds himself quietly recording some of British Columbia’s heaviest bands at the Noise Floor, his home recording studio on Gabriola Island. It’s a B&B-style recording studio operated by Koop and his wife on one of British Columbia’s more accessible retreats.

“My intention was to get out [of] Vancouver, try to buy a house, try to live on a gulf island, and also incorporate the studio. It had a lot to do with my own lifestyle, and the fact that my clients are willing to trek out here was the icing on the cake. Now I get to share a bit of my lifestyle with my clients and it’s good for everyone,” Koop explains.

After a week of intense Albini tutelage in mid-February, Koop reflects on the unique opportunity, “During the sessions with Steve it was very much master-student, but in the off hours all the participants discussed recording and mixing philosophies in addition to regular life topics.” But things became rapidly more congenial: “After demonstrating our own work to Steve, I think I saw a few light bulbs go off in his head too. Not only did we learn from Steve and Greg Norman (his right hand man), but we also learned from each other.”

Seeing Albini implement his unique recording style left an unforgettable impression on Koop: “Watching him execute the technical requirements of an all analog session was pretty intense. His brain is operating entirely on the left side.”

Having picked up a variety of new recording skills during his time in France, from knob-twiddling philosophies to drum-tuning techniques, Koop is eager to get the tape rolling again. When asked who he’s most excited to get back in the studio with, he humbly replies, “I’m excited for the work waiting for me ... but if my calendar was wide open and [I] could start a new project with somebody, I would want to record the sophomore Dead Soft album, and Group Vision — I was blown away by those guys when they played recently with my band.” Despite the Noise Floor’s packed recording schedule for the near future, let’s hope that’s not just wishful thinking.

What can local music fans otherwise expect from the Noise Floor in coming months? The result is rather inviting.

“I can’t afford to be a snob about who I work with ... I’ll work with anyone that wants to work with me ... I do the best job I can, no matter what the project is.” So if you’re looking to escape the city for your next batch of recordings, Koop’s relaxing locale and recently acquired expertise make the choice an obvious one.

IN GOOD HUMOUR

ERICA SIGURDSON

By Evan Brow // Illustrations by Jules Francisco

Erica Sigurdson was 25 years old and working at a bank. She had always wanted to do comedy, but it was a little secret she kept to herself.

When she was seven, Sigurdson saw her first comic on Johnny Carson. She fell in love with the idea of this person standing, talking, making the audience laugh, and getting laughs out of her dad in such a unique way. In grade nine, she told a boy about her desire to do comedy.

The boy said, “Oh, girls don’t do that.”

Sigurdson responded, “Oh, well you just watch. One day you’ll see me on TV.”

“That was the last time I had ever told anybody,” says Sigurdson. “Because if you tell someone you want to be funny, it’s like telling someone you want to be a model. You just open yourself up to people saying, ‘Oh, you’re not funny enough or pretty enough or good enough.’ So I didn’t tell anyone else until one day I was working in a bank and I used to do these funny newsletters — it’s not hard to be the funny person at a bank — and everyone was in the lunch room laughing at it. They said, ‘You’re going to be the person that we say ‘We knew you when...’ and then that was the first time I felt validated.”

Stepping on stage for her first show in 1999, Sigurdson is now a well-seasoned comedy pro. Appearing on The Debaters, The Winnipeg Comedy Festival, The Halifax Comedy Festival, and Just For Laughs on numerous occasions, Sigurdson has established herself as a staple in Canadian stand-up comedy, despite being a little shy growing up. Coming from a religious background with little exposure to stand-up comedy, Sigurdson mainly stayed away from performance, save for a few exceptions.

“I did get up at church camp and give fake sermons,” says Sigurdson. “Everyone

SIGURDSON, ON HER EXPERIENCE WITH COMEDY FESTIVALS:

“Festivals are a lot of fun. Winnipeg and Halifax and Just For Laughs are usually televised, so it’s a lot of fun but there’s also a lot of stress because you really don’t want to mess this up. But it’s all your friends. Because it’s the people you would do comedy with when you were just starting out. But once everybody becomes headliners, nobody works with each other anymore. So you go to a festival where it’s basically sleepaway camp for grown-ups who like to drink a lot and stay up till 6 a.m. And being from Vancouver — especially with the Halifax Comedy Festival, my flight is always at 5 o’clock in the morning — so I’m always leaving Halifax from the bar, getting in a car, and then flying home. It’s the worst flight home. It takes two days to recover. But it’s incredibly fun.”

thought I was going to be a preacher. That did not go as planned.”

But doing comedy was always what she wanted. Sigurdson grasped onto the idea of humour and absurdity and holding someone’s attention and being funny.

“It was the first thing in life I said I wanted to do and then really kept going with it. I’m infamous for signing up for a month of hot yoga and then never going again. I’m constantly finding new passions and then going, ‘Ugh, I’m not as passionate anymore.’ But comedy was the one thing that I stuck with. And now I’m in too deep. I can’t do anything else [laughs].”

With this persistence, Sigurdson has become very comfortable as one of Canada’s most established comics. Even the scary parts have become tame.

“The longer you’ve been doing it, having a joke not work used to be devastating when you were a new comic,” says Sigurdson. “But now you’re like, ‘Hmm, that’s not for you I guess. Whatever.’ Everybody drops a cup at work sometimes. And those jokes are just my broken wine glasses.”

And while Sigurdson occasionally “signs up for Athabasca University online to become a dental hygienist after a bad show,” she’s in comedy for the long haul, gathering fascinating experiences such as performing a televised stand-up show for Canadian soldiers in Kandahar, Afghanistan.

“My agent called me and said, ‘We have this offer for you to go to Afghanistan for the CBC.’ And immediately my first instinct was fear,” says Sigurdson. “But I found out that Shaun Majumder, Mark Critch, Tim Nutt, and Irwin Barker would be there too. And I said, ‘Okay, I know that the CBC wouldn’t put Mark Critch or Shaun Majumder in any danger. So I said, ‘Okay, I’ll go.’ It was a 10-day trip. And everyone is so appreciative of you going there and giving live entertainment. I went in 2006, so there wasn’t great Internet or access to YouTube.

“But it’s weird when the whole audience has machine guns. They carry their guns everywhere they go, so they’re just sitting there with guns, and you’re like, ‘Well this is pressure.’ And it’s so strange to be telling jokes about such insignificant things when these people are in Afghanistan, at war, and you know, ‘Oh, this is a funny story about my cat.’ But we were told that that was what they wanted. They wanted to be taken out of this and back to their regular lives. It was such a great experience. How many people go to Afghanistan? We got bombed too. There were a couple rocket attacks. Before it was all, ‘Look at what we’re doing!’ and after it was, ‘Oh, holy shit, we’re not in control of what happens here.’”

Through festivals, newsletters, and rocket attacks, Sigurdson’s drive for comedy runs strong. Much like when she discovered it at seven years old, Sigurdson will continue to hold stand-up as her truest passion. Whether she’s performing, debating, or writing that book she swears she’s going to write one day, Erica Sigurdson’s comedic mind will live on.

OK VANCOUVER OK

INFLUENCES

(Kingfisher Bluez)

The multi-faceted local group Ok Vancouver Ok is back with their ninth full-length release, Influences. Instrumentally, the album borrows sounds from bands that have inspired them in the past and lyrically builds on their own past two releases, Escape the Common People and Food Shelter Water. Influences features an eclectic collection of artists, including special performances by Ashley Eriksson and Eli Moore. Like much of their previously released music, Influences continues to explore themes of anti-capitalism, sustainability, and freedom.

Ok Vancouver Ok has produced a poetic and thought-provoking album in hopes of positively inspiring others with their forthright lyrics. While Influences lacks a standout track, this appears deliberate. The album, in its entirety, is a dreamy masterpiece. It takes form after a complete listen, with the bass and guitar ebbing and flowing from song-to-song, while up-tempo beats from the drums provide an overall unique mood. Ok Vancouver Ok has succeeded in producing a smooth sound filled with hazy, raw individuality. The lyrics in Influences reference diverse and broad subjects such as family and life, working well with lead singer Jeff Johnson's distinct and brilliant vocals.

Influences was written shortly after Johnson and Laura House (drums) wrapped up a six-month long tour. While they were on tour, their son Henry was born, which inspired the song "Collection Of Changes." The first and last song on the album ("Building A Way" and "Changes") lyrically reflects before and after having Henry and how he has changed their lives.

Influences is a poetic and pleasurable listen; a warm indie-pop soundtrack for a night in with family and friends. The blurred tones and crisp guitar strums make for a unique listening experience that takes you into Johnson's world of inspiration and creativity.

MALK

(Wiener Records)

Lately, Vancouver's music appreciators have noticed a renewed interest in '60s-tinged psychedelic and surfy garage rock. Prehistoric, the latest EP offering from Abbotsford's MALK, is one of them. As the title may suggest, MALK's sound is indebted to this '60s era of sound, now long past, and of this variety of retro revivalist albums, Prehistoric is one of the most inspired.

Keefer Pelech's recent Discorder feature explains how MALK recorded Prehistoric almost entirely live off the floor with producer Felix Fung. Fung's traditional approach could not have benefited Prehistoric more.

The album's emphasis on live performance is best heard in the opening and title track, which explode with surf rock's signature claustrophobic energy. Fung successfully captures MALK's vigorous performance, placing the listener right there in the room with the band. (Only it doesn't sound like a room, but more like a concrete tunnel, no greater than a couple of metres wide.) Kyle Schick's cutthroat guitar riffs sound-off like a rabid doomsday crier, roused by Fung's rich, but tasteful pall of reverb.

Though the '60s surf rock vibe is ever-present, Prehistoric is brushed with shades of '80s new-wave and post punk. Alex Smith's vocal delivery often conjures Fred Schneider's deadpan intensity in the B-52's. However, Smith's words forgo the absurdism, in favour of old-fashioned sincerity and whimsy. In "Each Other," he bemoans a failed relationship in the style of a lovelorn doo-wop single: "We sat around and sucked up the sky / Now all we do is make each other cry." The track's sinister guitar and synth textures, however, recast these sentiments in the same despair of The Cure's Disintegration.

The last track, "Satellites," is a slow-burning menace of a brooder, helmed by Miranda Maria's seductive vocal performance. While Maria's gothic crooning floats about, the song builds to a point of no return, as it finally erupts in a Morricone-meets-Vangelis cyclone, suggesting drummer Jaydee Bateman's familiarity with Stephen Morris.

On paper, MALK may seem like any other band riding the current wave of surfy garage rock. However, one listen to Prehistoric will reveal a young, lively, and distinguishable band whose success is derived, not only from an articulate amalgam of influences, but also from an unrivaled sense of urgency. Supported by Fung's exceptional production, it's obvious that MALK runs much deeper, below the waves.—Max Wainwright

BEST SUIT

THE CYRILLIC TYPEWRITER
(JAZ Records)

In just a few shorts years, artful indie outfit The Cyrillic Typewriter has come a long way from traditional West Coast twee to laudable endeavours into the avant-garde. Lead by Vancouver music veteran Jason Zumpano, whose name you may recognize from Destroyer and his own Zumpano project, his work as The Cyrillic Typewriter has seen him collaborate with a revolving cast of local heavyweights on four full-length albums in as many years.

The Cyrillic Typewriter's third album, Custodian, arrived in late 2013 and took a number of fans by surprise with its sharp left-turn towards conceptual cinematic pop. Developed as a soundtrack to a movie that doesn't exist, Custodian saw Zumpano's songwriting move in a drastically different direction, and his latest outing adds a second tally to that record of conceptual, yet visually unaccompanied releases.

Given its stripped down and digitized aesthetic, it should come as no surprise that Best Suit also offers The Cyrillic Typewriter's shortest personnel listing to date. Though the album is performed entirely by Zumpano (keys and long-time strings) and collaborator Megan Bradfield (double bass), there's no hiding the pop sensibilities of these 13 markedly minimal creations. Dynamic and immersing, some of Best Suit's songs are landmark expanses, full of buzzing ethers you're bound to get lost in — the dizzying "Whirlpool" clocks in at just under eight minutes — while others like "Closing In On Both Sides" and "Light Upon Feet" give listeners little more than a conceptual vignette, leaving much to the imagination of what Zumpano could be alluding to: twisted, beautiful, or otherwise.

Self-released on Zumpano's own JAZ Records, and distributed through The Business record shop in Anacortes, WA, physical copies of Best Suit might be tough to track down, but it's for those who take the time that this record holds the greatest appeal. And, with processing credits going to the currently-buzzing Loscil on three of the songs, "1st Suit," "2nd Suit," and "3rd Suit," Zumpano has again proven his quiet reach within the local music community and his determination to continue down the path of conceptual pop experimentation.—Robert Catherall

ENERGY SLIME

NEW DIMENSIONAL
(Mint Records)

If you happen to have a spare 13 minutes in your life and you're looking to fill that time void with something strange to listen to, New Dimensional may be your perfect fit. Yes, it's incredibly short in length, and so is each of the ten songs that comprise the album. This new sound from Energy Slime is a sucker-punch to the face of eclectic pseudo-psychedelic tracks that make you want to get really weird.

This isn't the first rodeo for frontman Jay Arner. If you've listened to his self-titled solo album, New Dimensional is going to sound like a chemically-soaked, kid-pop rendition of his previous work. Now joining hands with Jessica Delisle, this duo's camaraderie is evident on the album. With song titles like, "Graham Fucks The Queen" and "So Long Snakes," many of the tracks on New Dimensional seem like they were written based off of inside jokes between these two on an acid trip. Fantastical and fairytale-esque, this album is creative in an oddly intimate way, like the rainbow-coloured vomit from two peculiar psyches.

New Dimensional is a beautifully inclusive album that fosters an instantly personal connection with listeners. There are no pretensions — what you hear is what you get — and Energy Slime certainly doesn't flinch at proudly showcasing their oddities. However, what the album breeds in zest, it lacks in maturity. At times, discombobulation reigns supreme over sophistication when the latter would be preferable. New Dimensional is sporadic, messy, and frankly, slimy. The harmonies are all over the place and there is a lack of cohesive flow. That being said, the energetic and offbeat pace of the album are what make it the candid and truthful voice that it is.

New Dimensional is truly a piece of art; a piece of colourful abstract art that you look at a million times but never truly understand, which is why you keep looking at it.

SKIM MILK

(Self-Released)

Sam Davidson, a.k.a Skim Milk, provides a stark reminder that originality can be built from a wide variety of musical influences. This self-titled release offers a multi-faceted listening experience, pulling from a multitude of genres and sounds — jazz, experimental, electronic, and hip-hop — making it a treat for anyone looking to listen to something a little different and innovative.

Skim Milk's hooks are driven by dancing clarinet lines backed by drum samples and waves of synths, giving the album a high degree of flow from track to track. Despite running a little on the long side, the record is cohesive, original, and fresh.

Even though Skim Milk has a unified sound, there are some true stand out moments. In the second track “Two Ways Out,” Skim Milk has incorporated piano lines, clarinet, and synthy drum beats into an interesting experimental mix of sounds. Similar moments pop up in “Truth and Consequence.” “Blood Sweat and Tears” is only two minutes and 31 seconds long, but is a great slow-build tune. The swell of trumpet on top of a twirling clarinet solo is an example of Davidson’s ability to combine layers of different instruments while also smoothly transitioning the record into the finale, “Heartbeat.”

Davidson’s influences range from Bach to Boards of Canada, and both are relevant and can be heard clearly in this record. Specializing in clarinet, bass clarinet, and electric wind instruments (EWIs), Davidson’s clarinet pieces can be heard far above the variety of instruments (trumpets, bass, guitar, and trombone) and musicians he pulled in to make this record. Davidson states on his website that he strived to create “the world’s first clarinet-infused hip-hop album,” and he may have achieved just that. The record’s variety of instruments spans many eras and genres, and this is what separates it from the majority of local music released in 2015.

Skim Milk offers a different, unified, and eclectic combination of sounds with this new, self-titled release. A diverse sound mix, combined with the overall feel of a classical genre provides the perfect night-in soundtrack. This is a great record to settle down to with a good book and a fresh pint. If you are looking for something different to listen to, definitely check out Skim Milk’s latest. —Julia Lehn

SECRET PYRAMID
THE SILENT MARCH
(Students of Decay)

Vancouver's Amir Abbey is best understood in the painstaking devotion he takes in crafting the dense and meticulously constructed records of Secret Pyramid. His rare local performances are a fantastic look into Abbey's world of micro-focused drone arrays and fuzzed-out ambient floods, but even these are only slight preparation for the all-encompassing blocks of sound that Secret Pyramid spends so much time constructing for recordings.

The Silent March, originally issued as a cassette by Nice-Up International in 2011, is finally seeing a re-pressing by veteran weird-music record label, Students of Decay. Because of Secret Pyramid's minimal online presence, any new excuse to snap up physical copies of his releases is something to be cherished, and The Silent March is absolutely worthy of being reissued. The album marries the patience and clarity of Stars of the Lid with the sonorous thunder of a Sunn O))) doom jam — although the seven tracks are anything but metal, The Silent March is produced with a similar penchant for noise, feedback, and inescapable fuzz.

Deep, sweeping chords and sounds undulate, at times swirling and pulsing, in mournful minor keys on both sides of The Silent March. Although the themes that dance around the edges of the album aren't happy ones, the completely overwhelming chaos inside each song remains up to the listener to interpret. This is about as good as drone music gets.—Fraser Dobbs

YOUNG BRAISED
NORTHERN REFLECTIONS
(1080p)

For a rapper based out of the rainy Pacific Northwest, it's fitting that Young Braised's Northern Reflections furthers his exploration of cloud-rap based sounds. Featuring smooth beats and distorted vocals, Reflections is notable for its endless stream of entertaining samples and clever rap vocals; exploring new sounds while still feeling rooted in an older rap sound that endures throughout the album. Reflections succeeds most by blending dreamy beats with samples of old school rap. This fusion validates Young Braised's own rapping abilities while also showcasing his unique exploration into new areas of sound mixing.

Not many artists choose to rap over the extensive layering of beats in the way that Young Braised does. Under the moniker Young Braised, rapper Jaymes Bowman displays immense patience with his listeners, selling the long intros and outros that build and recede throughout the album without being overindulgent. "Entertainment's" slow, bass-filled build and vocal sampling nearly hides the point, as Bowman actually begins rapping over the song. Even his verses obscure the listener's sense of consciousness. Repeated rap lines, choruses, and distortion prove to be Bowman's signature tools in producing this track's dark, dream-like allure.

The album's middle lightens up in tone significantly, becoming slightly more upbeat while not overusing its laugh-inducing, tongue-in-cheek samples. Tracks "Casserole" and "Canada's Economic Action Plan" share computer-like glittery samples, while bookending the sentiments of sound with voice recordings.

Songs "Meditation" and "Middle Class Homie Quan" settle back into a darker tone for Reflections, with bells and synths establishing the tracks' cold tone. Sharper drumlines and vocals by Bowman infuse these songs with a dark, contemplative sound, more commonly found on modern rap releases. Bowman, however, never takes himself too seriously in these songs, as is evident in the comedic rap phrases that are repeated jokingly throughout the album.

Indeed, it is the constant juxtaposition of Bowman's vocals and his immense collection of samples that make Northern Reflections sound so unique, yet so easy to listen to. Never too grating to enjoy or too slow to ignore, Reflections will suck you in and just as easily drift by while you listen. Northern Reflections holds appeal for rap lovers and electronic music enthusiasts alike.

Silver Fox POSTERING

WAR & PASTE: THE TRUTH BEHIND VANCOUVER'S POSTER SCENE

by Elijah Teed // Photography by Tara Dwelsdorf

In the 1980s, Vancouver witnessed a peculiar increase in visual marketing: street posters had started to become a business venture.

For one company in particular, what began as a small group of allegedly forward-thinking and non-partisan people became something egregiously misshapen. Eventually a monopoly was formed in this niche marketplace. Turf wars were rumored, threats were allegedly made, but one thing was certain: a poster mafia had been born.

Most visibly in recent years though, a pushback against the dominant force in Vancouver's poster scene has emerged. Slashed, covered over, and torn down, the independent companies have suffered to have their product remain in public view.

Near the forefront of Vancouver's independent poster scene is Silver Fox Postering, run by partners Josh Garvin and Kristl Buckland. The company is a labour of love in all senses, with the couple each putting in substantial work to acquire, organize, and plaster thousands of posters every week. Garvin got his start in the business roughly 10 years ago, while working at a pub that was struggling to keep their ads up around town. As a way to earn some extra cash, he agreed to take on the lengthy postering process for them — and from those humble beginnings, he built a network of clientele suffering from the same problem.

“I started my own company entirely out of word of mouth,” Garvin explains with satisfaction. “I don't do any real advertising. People that genuinely want their stuff to do well will come to me.”

The choice to become an independent and not fall in with the poster mafia speaks to Silver Fox's almost philanthropic business model. Garvin frequently and happily posters for cheap or for free without hesitation, with him and Buckland each thrilled to be able to help the city's entangled poster and music scenes.

“I don't just worry about money because money doesn't really matter,” says Garvin.

“Someone just might not have enough money to do their show. There’s something, I think, that’s much more satisfying and gratifying in supporting people.”

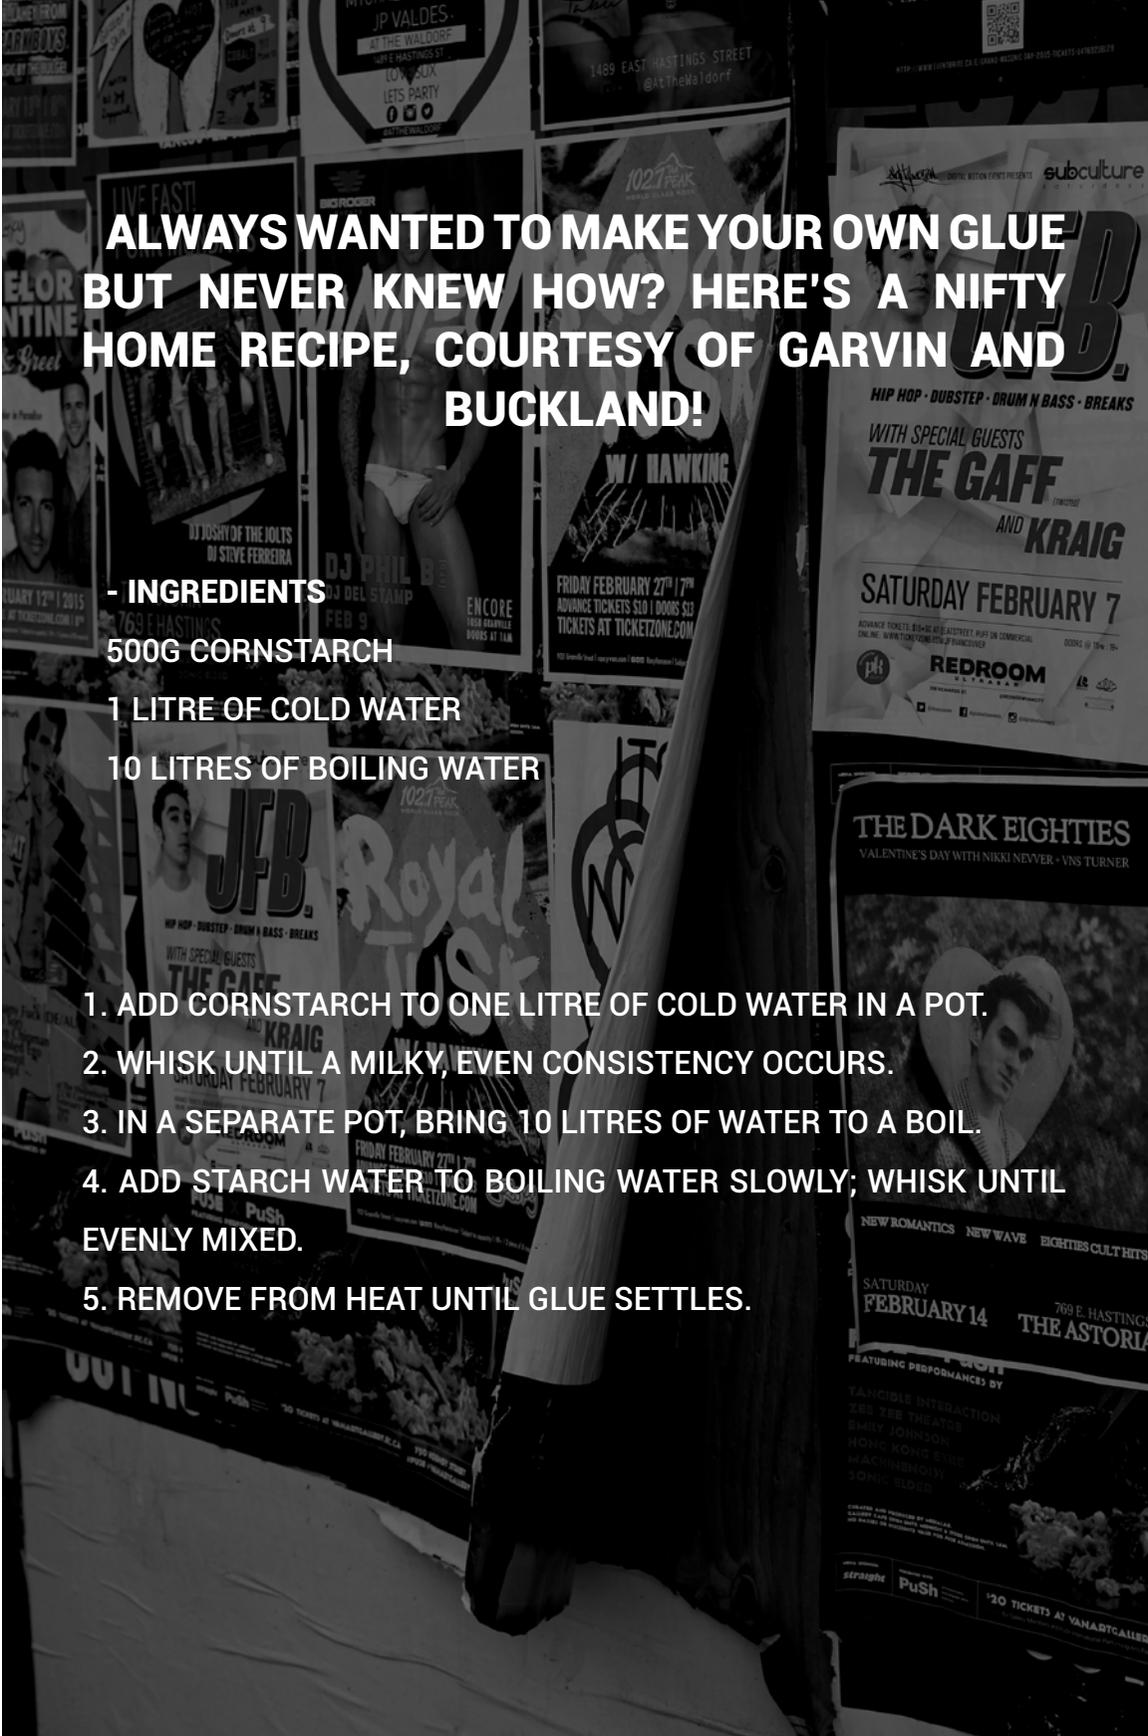

“If, in the whole world, everyone just worried about looking out for each other, no one would have to worry about looking out for himself or herself,” adds Buckland.

Garvin attests much of Silver Fox’s success to this mentality, and it’s hard to argue with. Knowing he and Buckland care about the bands to the extent that they do certainly makes working with independent contractors like them seem all the more appealing.

“I like the idea that people can have choice and options rather than having to be forced to use one large company. I can bring complete integrity to my work and know that I’m doing it properly ... I can always make sure that whatever I’m doing is 100 per cent aligned with what I believe in.”

For Garvin, while postering may have started as a side job, it quickly became a full-time enterprise. On average, Buckland and Garvin estimate Silver Fox puts up 600 posters a day, six days a week in the off-season, and twice that when it’s busy. Besides cycling around town, packaging posters and making glue (their homemade recipe, the result of tireless trial and error by Buckland herself) adds additional time to the process, turning what may seem like an easy exercise into an all-day event. The workload, however, is something they're both grateful for, considering the hazards their clients are subjected to.

“Our customers will get harassed,” says Buckland, with Garvin elaborating: “They’ll get phone calls from the big guys ... and I think they do it because they don’t know any better. It’s that weird, cartoonish bully thing.”

And it’s not just their customers who’ve felt the pressure of the poster mafia. Even though business is going well, Garvin and Buckland still find the need to be careful, moving around the city and changing routes to stay as safe and anonymous as possible.

with using an independent service, Garvin sees camaraderie growing in the face of adversity and is happy that Silver Fox is amongst the group of homegrown poster services responsible for change. “Over the last few years, [the community] has been getting really strong. The power that the bigger companies have is dwindling now, and it will continue to do so.”

Their confidence in the cause only matched by their passion for the work, Garvin and Buckland will no doubt continue to see more success in the future with Silver Fox bringing a level of compassion and integrity to every poster plastered.

LITTLE RED SOUNDS

VANCOUVER'S BLACK ARK

*by Jasper Winch // Photography by Yuko Inoue //
Illustrations by Emma Potter*

“Produced by Felix Fung at Little Red Sounds.”

It’s a sentence you see a lot these days if you’re even the slightest bit involved with Vancouver’s music scene. Fung’s name pops up everywhere — in the linear notes of CDs, in the credits listed on Bandcamps, on the tips of people’s tongues — and wherever it is, a mention of Little Red Sounds is sure to follow.

Even if you’ve never heard of Fung or his studio, you’ve undoubtedly heard something he’s produced. The Pretty’s, Did You Die?, The Ballantynes, Les Chaussettes, MALK, Animal Bodies, Candela Farm. The list could go on for ever — and for good reason. The music coming out of Little Red Sounds is consistently top-notch and the more they help create, the more bands want to be a part of it.

Four years after relocating Little Red Sounds to its present East Hastings location, Fung is still intent on capturing and enhancing the city’s vibrant musical community. Far from just producing records, the studio stands in as a community space and a place for musicians to explore and interact with one another.

And, as it goes, it seems as though there are always people just dropping by. Max Sample, employee of Little Red Sounds and bassist in The Ballantynes, drops by during Fung’s interview, as well as members of Did You Die? and The Pretty’s, just to hang out — but it’s an opportunity that Fung always seizes.

“When someone new is in the room, you hear it through them,” explains Fung. Instead of seeing drop-ins as an interruption, Fung sees them as a chance to gain new perspective. A new set of ears is always welcome at Little Red Sounds.

In a room with a drum set on one end and a mixing board on the other, the open space of the studio provides ample opportunities for action-packed and lively sessions; with the room filled with guitars, keyboards, amps, and couches, it’s easy to see how bands could enjoy their time there.

"I'M AN INSTIGATOR. FUCK MEDIATING.
WHAT PEOPLE NEED IN THE STUDIO IS SOMEBODY TO PUSH THEM TO THE POINT HERE IT'S REALLY EXCITING."

“We create an environment for the bands' dream-selves to occupy,” says Fung. Be it rock ‘n’ roll, country, garage, or electronic music, the studio is open to anything and ready to shift and morph into an accommodating space. “There's something cool within every genre that I want to make believe and play with it. Whatever it is, we can occupy that, reflected in how we record, how we set up the room.”

No matter what's being recorded, Fung finds a way to bring a liveliness and energy to the process. “I'm trying to get people to play that one take where there's something exciting, that something happened. I'm not going to call it magic; sometimes it's not magic, it's just something that happened that's very exciting, that you can't recapture.”

While Fung's recording process is in constant search of surprises and worthwhile idiosyncrasies, most of all, Fung is looking for “something everybody can be proud of. That's very important, that everybody's character is showing through, that they're truly being themselves, and that it sounds awesome. So I'm waiting for that take where I can hear, see, and feel the people playing like a band.” With nods of encouragement and agreement from the musicians around the room, it's clear that Little Red Sounds lives by those words. Music is not simply recorded there: it is created, explored, challenged, pushed to its limits, and finally captured there.

On his role in the studio, Fung attests to his active role in the recording process. He sees himself more of a producer than a recording engineer: “I'm an instigator. Fuck mediating. What people need in the studio is somebody to push them to the point where it's really exciting. We're not trying to capture a perfect take; we're trying to capture excitement.”

With a steady stream of bands coming and going, recording remarkable tracks, and playing off one another in the space, Little Red Sounds is one of the most sought after recording studios in Vancouver. What elevates it from just a studio into a undoubtedly extraordinary situation is Fung's golden touch. As Richie Alexander, guitarist and vocalist of local rockers Did You Die?, explains during his drop-by, "Felix can help elevate [a band]. He's a fresh set of ears, eyes, and has the experience and know-how."

As bands file through the studio, all gaining that prestigious tag — "Produced by Felix Fung at Little Red Sounds" — Vancouver's tight-knit music community continues to embrace Little Red Sounds. And while Fung himself is no stranger to performing in bands, his heart and mind are fully at home at the studio: "I'm back to the thing that I do best, and the thing that I love, and that's making records."
